

the topic 'You have to love your family, but you don't have to like them'

3 arguments FOR: 'You have to love your family. Even though you don't necessarily have to like them'

1\ The usual parent's and kid's problem - you can adore your parent or kid but still despise them for the things they have done.

2\ When love is a strong and a little hideous word it truly unravels itself in the smallest of things: brewing your mother a cup of tea, helping your father in the workshop or reading to your younger siblings. These simple moments will flash through your head when you miss them. Not the things you dislike about them.

3\ You don't have a chance to choose a blood family so there is no discussion about preferences or liking. You just learn to tolerate the things you dislike about your relatives to keep the peace.

3 arguments AGAINST: 'You have to love your family and you absolutely should like them'

1/ The family first of all is a support network for you since you are a kid. Always willing to help, they will be the ones to catch you if you fall down a rabbit hole and don't ask anything in return.

2/ Every family member has their own story to tell. If you find them boring, maybe, you just haven't found common ground yet.

3/ There is not a lot of people on the planet that appreciate your well being without a reason, just because.