

Consumption

In modern society there are plenty of opportunities to get yourself anything you want. But does it really change your life for good?

Over the centuries of existence of humankind it was a challenge to get goods for yourself: you had to save funds to make a significant purchase, walk your way to where you're getting your items, which were planted, harvested, processed, transferred and only then, several months or seasons later can you lay your eyes on it.

Nowadays, it takes less time to reach. It won't bother you if it's currently at the other end of the world. Whether it's in China, USA or Indonesia, you will get it within a month only by pressing a button on a phone. But do you really appreciate the purchase if it takes no effort to get? In addition, with affordability comes lesser quality. Things aren't long-lasting anymore. It became a tendency to refresh your closet every season. Not only because the quality is lower and your item wears out after a few launderings. But also because modern marketing strategies force you into thinking you need your clothes/tech/furniture to follow trends either it's a phone, jacket, boots or even a phone case.

So does this ability to reach anything you need with almost no effort means we live a better life today? We believe that people cherish their purchases less. When it's easy to get, it becomes less valuable. In addition, you are stuck in a cycle of getting more and more, chasing cheap dopamine and society's approval.

Hopefully we as a society will keep in mind that with that great power of consumerism comes great responsibility for our actions and start making decisions mindfully.

by Жукова(Zhukova), Исаева(Isaeva), Самсонова(Samsonova)